

Since signing up for the Indiana Attorney General's "no-call" list, our home life has improved considerably. We used to receive about three calls a day. We were in the habit of either screening calls by voicemail or taking the phone off the hook during dinnertime or our children's naptime in order to avoid the aggravation of interruptions. We were at risk of missing urgent calls from friends and family. Now we receive fewer than three calls per week. If the rule was changed to allow "existing customers" to be called, we would again be at the mercy of any organization to whom we said "yes" in a moment of weakness.
